What are the AARS Winners and why?

The All America Rose Selections (AARS) The All-American Rose Selections is a non-profit association of rose growers and introducers. The AARS finds the best roses for your garden by putting the toughest new plants to the test in our gardens for two years before they're available to the public. Look for the AARS Winners logo to ensure you're getting the best. These are the winners for 2009.

How is the list organized and roses found on the bench?

The list is sorted by Type and then by Color.

Why should you order early?

We have many limited varieties and we list how many we started with. To get the selection of roses that you want for this season, order early. We will run out of many varieties in a short time.

If the rose I want is not on the list can I order one?

We order roses in mid June for the next year so we can get a quality selection for you. We are unable to special order varieties in the same year.

What are the different types of roses?

Floribunda

Make any landscape designs stand out with the most colorful of rose types. Developed during the last century, these bushy shrubs have the large, showy blossoms of the hybrid teas, but bloom more freely, setting clusters of three to fifteen blossoms rather than a single bloom on a stem. Floribundas are versatile; an individual shrub will fit easily into almost any sunny border planting. However, they are perhaps most striking in mass plantings.

Hybrid Tea

One of the most popular rose types, these are tall, long-stemmed roses ideal for cutting--the roses you usually see at the florist. The flowers are usually borne singly, one to a stem, rather than in clusters. Blooms have a high-center point. In the garden they are often featured as single specimens or in a traditional rose cutting garden. Many varieties reveal a beautiful fragrance.

Grandiflora

A grandiflora is a cross between a floribunda and a hybrid tea. Grandifloras are tall elegant plants which bloom repeatedly during the season, and generally feature classic hybrid tea flower clusters with stems which are slightly shorter than those of hybrid teas.

Shrub & Landscape

These roses have changed the way many people view roses. Shrub roses, especially when compared with traditional varieties, are impressive for many reasons: their natural disease-resistance, their willingness to grow in a variety of climates with a minimum of attention from the gardener, their compact growth habit (very little pruning required), not to mention the great beauty of their flowers, which are borne consistently over a very long season. Coming in all shapes and sizes, shrub and landscape roses work well in any landscape. Landscape roses grow close to the ground, like ground cover, and have a very spreading habit.

Climber

Climbing roses help dress up any garden. They produce long, arching canes with numerous flowers that can be trained to a trellis, fence, or other supporting structure. Grow them up and over an arching trellis to make a striking entryway; train them up a lattice to adorn a plain wall.

Miniature

Perfection on this scale can't fail to captivate! Miniature roses are the smallest of rose plants, growing anywhere from six inches to two feet tall. This rose type is hardy, flowers continuously and is perfect for container gardening, make lovely borders, and solve the space problem for those with a small yard or balcony. Miniatures are grown on their own root.

Tree Roses

Tree roses are made up of a hardy root stock grafted to a long stem that is, in turn, grafted to a rose bush at the top of the stem. They are very elegant lining a walkway or as a feature amongst other plantings. The tree rose is a lovely addition to the garden, but extra care is needed to insure its survival over winter. We have an excellent selection of colors in two different sizes 24" at $34.95 and 36" at $44.95. Many people will leave the tree rose in a container on the patio all summer long.

Pruning Roses

Basic Pruning

Most roses can be pruned quite easily. Allow the plant to grow and fill out during its first and second years. At the end of the third season, shear off the top third of the plant, trimming all branches to achieve a uniform shape. To encourage new blooms, trim away old flowers as they fade throughout the blooming season.

Step 1

Examine the rose for sucker growth (any shoot that grows below the bud union – occurs on grafted roses only). If suckers are present dig down and pull them out from the root. Suckers rob the plant of its strength.

Step 2

Remove dead wood (distinguishable by its darker color) and broken or diseased canes. Prune 1/4" above an out-facing bud, 2"-3" below the damage.

Step 3

Prune away weak or spindly canes, leaving the stronger ones to grow. If canes are crossed or badly congested, remove the smaller, weaker canes. This will strengthen remaining canes and preserve the health of the plant.

Step 4

Prune all remaining canes to maintain a rounded form and encourage growth. Cut 1/4" above the nearest out-facing bud at the height you desire. For larger blooms, leave 3-5 canes and prune back to 12"-18" high. For more blooms and a larger shrub, leave 5-12 canes and prune to 1/2 -2/3 of present height.

Pruning Tools:

▶ Use any pruning shears designed for roses. Use a long-handled lopping shears for larger, more mature canes.

When to Prune:

▶ The best time to prune is late winter, before new growth starts in the spring, sometime after the last hard frost. Do not prune once new growth is 2" -3" long. Fall pruning is necessary only when plants are extremely tall, to prevent wind damage during winter.

What to Prune:

▶ Weak, diseased or winter-damaged wood, which looks brown and dry on the outside, should be removed 1 -2 inches below the damage. Also remove any branch crossing or rubbing another — always leave the newest, healthiest cane.

Pruning for Show-Quality Blooms:

▶ If you choose to grow your rose plants to produce fewer but larger, show-quality blooms, prune according to the illustrated steps. Always trim away old flowers as they fade to encourage new and larger blooms.

Winter Care of Roses

Winter protection is important to make sure your plants are healthy going into winter. Healthy plants have a better survival rate during our severe winters. In the fall, leave the last blooms on the plant so hips will form (decorative seed pods). When the rose has hips, growth will slow and dormancy will prevail.

WINTER PROTECTION FOR:

Hybrid Teas, Floribundas, Grandifloras and Miniatures :

1. After 3 frosts of 28 degrees, tie all the canes together to protect them from wind damage.

NOTE: Do not prune rose bushes in the fall.

2. Sanitation practices play a big part in raising roses. Remove all diseased leaves from the plant and ground area during the growing season and before winter dormancy to prevent re-infestations of pest and fungal organisms. If recycling rose collars, be sure to disinfect them before use so diseases harbored from the previous year, do not reinfect the plants.

3. Apply systemic insecticide and fungicide to the rose canes and soil surface until the first frost. This will provide the plant with some protection against fungal growth over the winter. You can also use a dormant oil spray. Which will act as a protective coating on the plant, to also help prevent fungal growth.

4. Cover the crown of each plant with a soil, bark mulch, or cocoa bean mulch mound approximately 10 inches high to protect against frequent temperature changes and extreme cold, which will injure your roses. Schroeder's Plant Doctors recommend using a rose collar, which is 9 inches high and 12 inches wide to prevent the mound from spreading out and not giving the proper insulation for the roses. Or you can construct your own collar. If you are using rose cones, you can prune just enough to get the roses under the cone. The soil or mulch should be mounded as mentioned in step #4 - make sure there are holes in the top and side of the cone to provide air movement.

NOTE: There are limited results with using rose cones.

5. After the mound has frozen in the late fall, generally around Thanksgiving, pile marsh hay, straw or leaves over the mounded canes and between the rose bushes. Hold the material in place by covering with some soil. These materials help keep the soil temperature constant preventing premature thawing and re-freezing resulting in heaving of the soil which snaps the roots. NOTE: Remove the mulch in the Spring, on a gradual basis, after danger of severe frost is past to prevent damage caused by poor air circulation.

English Roses:

These roses have a stronger survival rate than the previously mentioned roses. Good results have been reported with a minimal amount of protection such as following steps 1 - 4. Some people have had a high survival rate just raking a good amount of leaves around the plants.

Climbing Roses:

Follow steps 1 - 3 then lay all the canes to the ground and hold with wire pins or notched stakes. Cover the entire plant (canes and all) with several inches of soil, bark mulch or cocoa bean mulch. After the soil or mulch has frozen cover the soil with marsh hay or straw. Remove the mulch on a gradual basis in the Spring after danger of frost. NOTE: Schroeder's Plant Doctors recommend winter hardy shrub/climber roses do not need winter protection: Henry Kelsey, William Baffin, John Cabot, from the Explorer Series.

Tree Roses:

Option #1: You planted the tree in the ground:

After three 28 degree frosts, dig carefully under the roots on one side of the plant until the plant can be completely laid on the ground. This must be done very carefully to prevent breaking all root connections with the soil. Cover the entire plant with several inches of soil or bark mulch. After the soil or mulch freezes, cover with marsh hay or straw. In the Spring after danger of frost, gradually remove the mulch and set the plant upright.

Option #2: You left the tree in it's pot:

After three 28 degree frosts dig a trench in an empty space in the garden 8 inches deep and long enough to fit the height of the rose and pot. Lay the rose in the trench and cover with an old sheet, then cover with the soil removed from the trench. After the ground has frozen rake over with leaves or cover with straw or marsh hay. Dig up in the Spring after danger of hard frost is past. NOTE: Make sure to mark where the rose is so as not to accidentally cut it in half in the Spring!

Option #3: You left the tree in it's pot:

After three 28 degree frosts, bring the pot into an attached unheated garage. Wrap the entire plant, pot and all, with old sheets or burlap and set up on blocks so it's not sitting on the cold floor. Make sure to water well before storing and check monthly if it needs to be watered. Remove from the garage after danger of hard frost in Spring. NOTE: This is the least effective of the three options.
Rose survival rate is not 100%.

Shrub Roses:

Hybrid Rugosa roses do not need winter protection. Other shrub roses could benefit from a mound of bark mulch placed around the base of the plant 4-6 inches deep after three 28 degree frosts. Be sure to remove the extra mulch in the spring after danger of a hard freeze has passed.
